Developing Countries’ Participation in International Negotiations

Working Papers

The last 20 years have seen developing countries move from being excluded or sidelined in international negotiations to active participation. As negotiations resume in the WTO and on climate change, studies by ODI, with country experts from Bolivia and Zimbabwe, examine:

How and when can participation by economically and politically weak countries influence the results? Are there lessons, for other countries, for the international institutions themselves, or for donors deciding how to target assistance, from the success of some countries, and the failures of others?

The study forms part of the Globalisation and Poverty programme, financed by DFID.

Working paper titles include:

- A Review of the Effectiveness of Developing Country Participation in the Climate Change Convention Negotiations
  Michael Richards, Overseas Development Group, London
- Bolivia’s Participation in the UN Framework on Climate Change

The Overseas Development Institute is Britain’s leading independent think-tank on international development and humanitarian issues. Its mission is to inspire and inform policy and practice which lead to the reduction of poverty, the alleviation of suffering and the achievement of sustainable livelihoods in developing countries. It does this by locking together high-quality applied research, practical policy advice, and policy-focused dissemination and debate. As part of this effort, it publishes two refereed journals, Development Policy Review and Disasters.

Notes for Contributors

Development Policy Review is the refereed journal that makes the crucial links between research and policy in international development. Edited by staff of the Overseas Development Institute, it publishes single articles and theme issues on topics at the forefront of current development policy debate.

DPR invites contributions on all aspects of international development, from any discipline and all regions of the world. Preference is given to articles and short notes that identify unresolved issues, and address these in a way that is relevant across a range of situations and fields of specialisation. Proposals for survey papers and theme issues are welcome, as are general enquiries from prospective contributors. The editors are happy to hear from readers willing to review books.

Papers submitted to DPR should be original contributions, not previously published and not under consideration elsewhere. The normal length of articles is 7–8,000 words, but the editors will consider longer pieces if there is substantial empirical material or analysis.

Papers may be submitted as either typescripts or e-mail attachments in Word or WordPerfect. In the case of typescripts, two copies are normally required, but contributors from outside the UK may submit only one copy if they wish. Full contact details of the author, or a corresponding author in the case of joint work, should be included, together with an indication of the total length in words.

Submissions received will be acknowledged immediately, usually by e-mail, and the editors will normally make a decision within three months. All papers are fully refereed before acceptance. Revisions are required in most cases.

Article texts should be double- or 1.5-spaced, with numbered pages. They must include an abstract of 90-120 words. Short, attractive titles are preferred, and section headings and sub-headings should be used consistently and imaginatively. Analysis must meet prevailing standards of rigour in the relevant disciplines. However, authors are encouraged to avoid unnecessary jargon and provide lucid summaries of technical argument and tabular material.

The best guide to current style is a recent issue of the Review. However, the following points should be particularly noted. The author’s institutional affiliation and any necessary background or acknowledgements should appear as an unnumbered note at the foot of the first page. The Harvard style of referencing is used (author’s name and date of publication bracketed in the text). Notes should be placed at the foot of the page, with an alphabetical list of references at the end.

British spelling is used throughout. Tables should be modelled on those in a recent issue of the Review, taking account of the difference on page size. Printing charts is costly and difficult; these will be accepted only in exceptional circumstances.

Authors receive 25 offprints free, and a copy of the issue in which their article appears.
