

Full Conflicts of Interest Policy

Conflicts of interest include facts known to a participant in the publication process that if revealed later, would make a reasonable reader feel misled or deceived (or an author, reviewer, or editor feel defensive). Conflicts of interest may influence the judgment of authors, reviewers, and editors; these conflicts often are not immediately apparent to others or to the reviewer. They may be personal, commercial, political, governmental, academic, or financial. Financial interests may include employment, research funding (received or pending), stock or share ownership, patents, payment for lectures or travel, consultancies, non-financial support, or any fiduciary interest in a company. The perception or appearance of a conflict of interest, without regard to substance, alone creates conflict, since trust is eroded among all participants.

All such interests (or their absence) must be declared in writing by authors upon submission of the manuscript. If any are declared, they should be published with the article. If there is doubt about whether a circumstance represents a conflict, it should be disclosed. Sources of full or partial funding or other support for the research must be declared and should be described in the Funding section on the title page submitted with the manuscript.

Aside from financial interests, there may be other real or potential conflicts that need to be disclosed. If anyone besides the authors is involved in analysis, interpretation, or control of the data, this must also be declared. The role of the funding organization or sponsor in the design and conduct of the study, in the collection, analysis, and interpretation of the data, and in the preparation, review, or approval of the manuscript should be specified. The term “contractual right” includes not only formal contracts and memoranda of understanding with outside parties, but also rights of your employer to review and approve your publications. If a funding organization, sponsor, or employer retains the contractual right to review and comment on a manuscript, but cannot withdraw, edit, or censor the manuscript, then this contractual right must be declared when submitting the manuscript. If a funding organization, sponsor, or employer retains the contractual right to withdraw, edit, or censor a manuscript, we will consider it “work for hire” and in general will not publish it as research. Any potential non-financial conflicts of interests should also be declared and described in the Disclosures section on the title page.

Any reviewer who has reason to believe he or she may have a conflict of interest on a particular manuscript is required to reveal that conflict to the editor, who will then determine the reviewer’s appropriate level of involvement.

The journal’s policy on conflicts of interest is adapted from the American Journal of Public Health Policy on Ethical Principles (<http://ajph.aphapublications.org/misc/AJPHEthicsPolicyFinal110307.pdf>) and the Conflicts of Interest policy of the International Committee of Medical Journal Editors (http://www.icmje.org/ethical\_4conflicts.html).
